It's a season of evil at the American Dime and Drug. It courses through every air conditioning duct and computer cable. It contaminates every chalky pill and cocaine dusted twenty dollar bill. The building breathes and pulses a toxic heartbeat. Everyone who works there feels sucked into a black hole of soul crushing retail gravity from which there is no escape. The manager, Kenny, struggles to keep his ship afloat against the over demanding tide of expectations of the district supervisor, Heather, who finds giddy pleasure in setting him up for failure. His assistant, Alex, has a kamikaze management style that everyday could see him fired or dead or both. Dennis, the head cashier, often talks with an imaginary friend and is the employee most likely to show up for work with an assault weapon. Does Kenny really have time for aliens landing behind the store on truck day? Does he have time for the hundred or so people who decided the store parking lot was a great place to stop and pray? No, and the employee manual contains no instructions for such events. And, don't forget that piece of silver duct tape on the mirrored column on aisle fourteen. The one with the message scrawled in permanent marker across the wrinkled surface. "Do not remove! Ever!" It's a madhouse! A madhouse with great customer service. The American Dime and Drug on Abelia Street is ground zero for the apocalypse, and Kenny wants to know why.
