What would cause a society to abandon the art and mastery that writers and poets of old captured on paper? When did the world lose its ability to distinguish true talent from frivolity? Why would a man burn books? Tom Montague is a classic university student who experiences textbook college situations. Through a series of encounters during a single day in his life, his perception is changed as he realizes just what is deemed important to his society and what is considered no better than kindling. This story is written in honor of Mr. Ray Bradbury as a connection point between the world he lived in and the world he created. That connection point is the world of today.
