On the surface, they were the perfect couple: popular, happy, completely in love. Gina's senior year was supposed to be carefree and fun with the perfect boy at her side. Except Mark wasn't perfect. At first, his dark streak emerged rarely – when she forgot to call or didn't do what he asked her. He always apologized for hurting her, and she convinced herself that was enough. As the year progressed, he became more controlling, more violent, until Gina realized she had to make a choice: live in the shadow of Mark's abuse and pretend everything was okay or save herself, even if it meant losing him. Freedom or fear? It wasn't supposed to be like this ...
