He rode down from the rim rock and into that red dirt gulch. He followed the game trail to the little creek below. Just a tiny trickle of clear water ran down the middle like a faded red ribbon as it passed over the red clay that formed its banks. He was lucky for it was plenty to drink from and fill his canteen. He would drink upstream of his old dun cayuse whom he called Jimmy. He would not make his thirsty horse wait until after he drank and filled his canteen. He was riding alone today. In fact, it seemed to him at just that moment that was the way he had spent most of his life—alone.
